VERA CRUZ, April 24.-General Maas is threatening to attack this city. Admiral Fletcher has advised all Americans to leave the hotels and spend the night on the ships. He offered no explanation. General Maas has received reinforcements, but his force is still inferior to that of the Americans. He is encamped fifteen miles from the city.

Fletcher's orders came close upon in interview in which he stated that he desired to restore to a completenormal basis the business and social life of the city. Last night women and children again ventured in-to the streets, and the cafes were crowded. This is exactly what Fletcher desired. The order today was therefore a shock. It was urged hat he must have sufficient reasons, and the attack by General Maas was apparently the most reasonable. American officers have promised a warm reception in case the Mexicans return. All automobiles have been commandeered to move the marines.

A CENSORED PRESS

An uncensored dispatch from Mexico dated last week and sent by mail by way of Havana, Cuba, to escape the censorship, describes a situation in the Mexican capital which illus trates vividly the absolute importance of a free and uncensored press ever. where and always. This dispatch was sent after the conclusive victories of he Constitutionalists in the north and during the midst of the negotiations with the United States which have since disrupted diplomatic negotiations with Mexico, and have brought us into the midst of actual war. During this time ninety-nine per cent of the population of the modern and superficially highly civilized city of Mexico did not even know that there was an issue between the United States and Mexico, and rested secure in the information that the federal troops were everywhere scoring triumphant victories over the Constitutionalists in the north. A censorship was maintained over the telegraph offices, over the newspaper correspondents and over the newspapers whose policy frankly ignored all question of veracity and insisted merely that all news unfavorable to the government should be omitted and that alegations favorable to the govment should be printed as if they ere true. The result is that in an ensibly republican government, at n nation, and intimately concerns e personal fate of every Mexican tizen, the majority of these citizens ven in the capital city do not even know that such a crisis exists.

This is the result of the public control of news at its extremest and worst Suppose we contrast a hypothetical situation of the private liberty of news also at its extremest and worst. Suppose instead of official censorship in Mexico, or anywhere, there were absolute irresponsibility recklessly indulged in. Suppose that anybody who pleased might and did run a newspaper and that half of these newspapers had no sense of truth at all, but printed whatever lies they found convenient or pleasant. Even under these atrocious conditions, the truth would soon prevail. The contradictory falsehoods of the irresponsible part of the press would neutralize each other and the very logic of circumstances and consistency would soon distinguish the newspapers which go out of existence or cease to be believed, and the ppeole would get the papers even if there were not one of
